Rwanda, in a movement dictated by both the regional economy and post-genocide policy, decreed a wholesale switch to English as its means of instruction. And China is about to launch a colossal program to face one of the few remaining obstacles to its broken economic expansion: a break from the English speakers. "English has official or special status in at least 75 countries with a combined population of two billion people. It is estimated that one of the four people around the world speak English with some degree of competence." English derived from a proto-Indo-European language spoken by nomads wandering around Europe about 5,000 years ago. German also came from this language. English is conventionally divided into three major historical periods: Old English, Middle English and Modern English. Ancient English was brought to the British islands by Germanic peoples: the Jutes, Saxons and Angles, beginning in 449. With the establishment of learning centers in Winchester, stories being written, and the translation of important Latin texts into the dialect of the Western Saxon in 800s, the dialect spoken there became the official "Old English". The words adopted came from Scandinavian languages. In the Norman conquest in 1066, the Norman French dialect (which was French with Germanic influence) reached Britain. The learning center gradually moved from Winchester to London, so ancient English no longer dominated. The Norman French, spoken by the aristocracy, and the ancient English, spoken by the common people, interfered over time to become middle English. In the 1200s, about 10,000 French words had been incorporated into English.
